Picturing People: The New State Of The Art

Synopsis

An insightful look at how artists choose to represent people in their work, and why What drives artists to represent people as they do? This question, at the heart of figurative art, and how we represent ourselves as a society, is especially relevant today. Author Charlotte Mullins picks up the conversation at a time when the art world is influenced by the proliferation of images of all kinds, across all mediums, as well as a growing interest in figurative art. Profiles of nearly sixty artistsâ •from Kara Walker and Grayson Perry to Cindy Sherman and Kehinde Wileyâ •showcase significant works and are accompanied by the artistsâ™ commentary, illustrating the range of motivations, mediums, and techniques driving one of the most potent genres of art today. The book is organized into five thematic sections that reflect artistsâ™ motivations, which range from investigating the history of art itself to exploring interpersonal relationships. Mullinsâ™s keen curatorial eye picks out informed, sometimes unexpected juxtapositions of artists that reveal new affinities and distinctions between them, making Picturing People an important contribution to the study of figurative art. 200+ illustrations

â œIn this companion to 2006â™s Painting People, art critic Charlotte Mullins explores the latest wave of figurative art in the contemporary marketplace, both celebrating individual artists and contemplating why figuration has become popular yet again. [. . .] Figurative art is a broad subject, but Mullinsâ™s astute overview pairs powerfully with the selected images, offering a perceptive argument for the enduring range and power of figuration into the 21st century.â • - Publishers
