Customer Reviews

In this handsome little book, author Barbara Harrelson does her best to highlight the region's Native American, Hispanic and Anglo-American literary heritage. Harrelson mentions these literary figures and many more. She also discusses historic preservation and the Santa Fe style of architecture as well as bookshops, libraries, museums and even cathedrals. (Chicago Tribune 2007-06-10) Walks in Literary Santa Fe is a dandy pocket-sized guide to the worlds of Mabel Dodge Luhan and Edward Abbey, among many others. Also covered are Lew Wallace, who wrote Ben-Hur in Santa Fe in the late 19th century, Conrad Richter, Billy the Kid (he didn't write anything, but an awful lot has been written about him), Evan Connell, Jack Schaefer, N. Scott Momaday, and Willa Cather, who set Death Comes for the Archbishop there. Overall, an excellent guide to the literary sites of one of the Southwest's most picturesque places. (Palm Beach Post 2007-06-10) Harrelson also packs in a lot of history here, from the early Spanish colonization to the Manhattan Project. She discusses writers contemporary and historical and places them all in the history of the city and state. The result is a small but comprehensive guide to the town that loves to call itself The City Different. (Santa Fe New Mexican 2007-06-03) In a town known for its visual arts, adobes, landscape and food, Harrelson creates neighborhood walks describing landmarks through the words of and associations with stories and authors. (San Francisco Chronicle 2007-05-31)
